Eddie Ahn went to law school but never stopped drawing. The story of his scrappy transformation of an environmental justice organization comes in the form of a graphic memoir that was selected by the Washington Post as “Best Graphic Novel of the Year.” Advocate pairs Ahn’s passions for art and community organizing.

Join Asian American Studies Professor Lisa Park and Ahn as they engage in a discussion about racial and economic inequality in the face of rising environmental catastrophes, along with what it means to choose community service and activism in the world ahead.
